

his goddess she quickly sinks into a woman,' but the English philosopher and man of letters failed to say further that until he is old and gray, having lost his 'goddess' he goes out hunting for a new one."

"Margie, Margie, you are cynical."

"No, my dear, for even you must realize that after goddesses, women must be rather tame. Mollie, dear, let me tell you something that I have learned since marriage: No man's love is worth the sacrifice of everything a woman has to give, because it is only the passionate love of man that will ask this sacrifice and no man can love a woman passionately to the end of his life, and in nine cases out of ten instead of putting the calmer and vastly more enduring conjugal affection in its place, he goes out in the world again to seek his 'goddess.'"

(To Be Continued Tomorrow.)

GUESS IF THEY ARE MARRIED

